A suit was filed in the district court yesterday entitled the Charter Oak Land & Stock Co. vs. the Board of County Commissioners of El Paso county. The complaint alleges three causes why damages should be paid, all growing out of the fact that the county commissioners refused to grant a certain road on the Little Dipper upon the recommendation of the viewers that it is a public road and plaintiff's claim that the road is partly through their property. Plaintiffs ask damages and for a restraining order which will prevent the county commissioners from interfering while defendants put up their fences to suit themselves.

Judge Campbell on Saturday gave a decision in the case of Hall et al. vs. Dorsey et al., in the matter of water right. Judge Campbell rendered a decree for the defendants, holding that the forfeiture of water rights by reason of non-use does not apply to the case of irrigation ditches.

Hoyt's "A Texas Steer."

As the Opera House Discovering will be Hoyt's most successful play, "A Texas Steer." That the play has had a run of 300 nights, and that it is still packed by the same capable actors who have been identified with it ever since its original production is evident, as below will be found a most complimentary notice from one of our exchanges: "The company with two exceptions is the same as that witnessed by last season. These forcibly speak without saying that the performance is smooth, spirited and spontaneous. Tim Murphy's impersonation of the Texas cowboy again is marked by the same clean cut intelligent character acting always surmounted by Mr. Murphy's own perpetuation of the rôle. If anything, the impersonation is better for its time and symmetry than before."

"The character of Betsy, which was first played by the late Flora Walsh, is now entrusted to Miss Alice Evans. Miss Evans can certainly be credited with surprising theatre goers in this role. Hitherto she has been identified with subjective characters in which a rosy cheek and a pretty face are the principal requirements."
